

FROM THE ARCHIVE

THE TABLET • 12 AUGUST 1967

The Dutch Catholics have produced a new Catechism for adults which has already sold three-quarters of a million copies in the Netherlands. It is not only a fresh presentation of the faith but embodies a new method of teaching ... There are many dangers in what is happening. Sixty priests left the ministry last year. The theological re-thinking tends to lose hold of the fact that Christian belief depends on events that actually occurred.

There is a danger of losing the sense of mystery ... There is great danger in the gulf between the "conservative" and "progressive" wings. The conservatives seem too proud to climb down and join the pilgrim Church, while the progressives can deal brutally with tradition ... Piet Fransen, a professor at Louvain, has stated bluntly that "things are being said and written which cannot possibly be reconciled with our faith".

THE TABLET • 11 AUGUST 1917

Sir ... The Protestant virus was not swallowed here in the same big dose [as in north Germany]. England for centuries had been saturated with Catholicism and with the Latin tradition and culture. The new religion was but sullenly accepted, or crammed down the throats of the people ... It was not here so absolute and total a break with the past ... and the state Church here retained more of the old Church's doctrine and much of its outward constitution and semblance. We have had thinkers who, cut off from traditional Catholic teaching, sowed the seeds of scepticism: but these did not reach the hearts of our people. We are a practical rather than a logical race, content, if left to ourselves, to till and trade and grow rich, to listen rather than to talk, to live and let live, and jog on in the old conservative rut. I am, yours, &c., George Ambrose [Burton], Bishop of Clifton.
