THE TABLET • 18 NOVEMBER 1967

Three years ago, when enquiry was made in Rome concerning the chances of permission being given for reciting the Canon of the Mass in the vernacular, the post-conciliar liturgical Consilium replied with an emphatic NO. Under pressure from various episcopates, however, the Consilium modified its attitude, and last year it became known that even translations of the Canon might be officially authorised for public use ...

What the Consilium expects ... has been made plain by ... Cardinal Lercaro. The Roman Canon must be taken as it stands, "without mutilation or simplifications of any kind" ... The cardinal even asks that the translation shall be not only complete but literal. He presumably means that, if the liturgy uses expressions which run or seem to run counter to the spirit of the age, we should let it teach us to modify our sometimes callow notions.

THE TABLET • 17 NOVEMBER 1917

Granted a just war, its legitimate operations are to render the hostile will impotent by destroying its physical powers ... War is ruthless. It has horrors ... Lord Kitchener was eminently justified in preparing poisoned gas immediately that Germany had adopted it ... So also with air reprisals. If they have a military value in the physical or moral order—and Germany's action in thinking such raids have a military value against us goes to prove that they would yield a military advantage against her – the fact that by convention such raids were unlawful no longer obtains. The convention is broken. Take also the atrocity of killing wounded combatants. The theory is that a wounded man is no longer able to discharge a military duty. He is literally hors de combat. He might, indeed, get better and return to fight, but Christian pity surrounded him by mutual conventions. That convention even has gone.
