THE TABLET • 9 DECEMBER 1967

The whole experience of “falling in love” in the obsessive, emotional sense seems a relatively modern one ... We can see a change taking place in the general structure of the marital relationship over the course of the centuries. The dogmatic theologians have somewhat tardily responded by allowing the companionship, the bonum mutuum, to move from a subordinate “end” of the sacrament towards full equality with “the generation and education of children” as the purpose of the sacrament. The moral theologians, and the faithful themselves, have come at least very near to holding that, whenever it is necessary for the fostering of the bonum mutuum to continue an active life of sexual intercourse, which it normally is, while excluding on grounds of health or economic difficulties the procreation of children, the use of artificial contraceptives is no more sinful than the exploitation of the infertile period.

It is indeed an ominous sign ... that these [reports presented to Parliament on “Industrial Unrest”] all but unanimously testify to a widespread and deep-seated dissatisfaction with government ... Not only do we hear from every quarter that outcry against the high prices of food and against the abuse of profiteering with which the daily press has made us familiar, but we find, again and again, complaints of the undue multiplication of government departments, of the multiplicity and frequent changes of regulations, of the intolerable delays in the transaction of urgent business, of the system of centralisation to which the last-named evils are, as is alleged, largely due, and of the needless expenditure which has been an inevitable consequence of the methods adopted ... “The unrest,” we are told, “is such as to constitute a national danger unless dealt with promptly and effectively.”
