THE TABLET • 9 NOVEMBER 1968

Strong as the arguments may be for radically reforming the public schools, it is far from easy to see what in practice can usefully be done about them by the State. If we had an egalitarian society in which everybody had an income equal to that of his neighbours, the public school in any present form would obviously automatically come to an end. But we do not have such a society and the Labour Party itself clearly has no intention at all of establishing it. So long as some people are allowed to have more money than others, it is neither easy nor indeed sane to prevent them from spending some of it on educating their children.

It is therefore becoming increasingly evident that if the public schools should ever come to an end, it will be not as a result of any suppression by Act of Parliament but because there are no longer sufficient parents who are able or willing to pay their fees.

The great drama of the war is rushing to its close ... Turkey and Austria-Hungary, following the example of Bulgaria, have "retired hurt", and the German armies on a front of a hundred miles are retreating at such a pace that the pursuing Allies have difficulty in keeping up with them. The submission of the Turks, though made inevitable by the defection of Bulgaria, was the direct result of the destruction of her armies in Asia. General Allenby had not only conquered and overrun the whole of Palestine and Syria, from Gaza to Aleppo, but annihilated the Turkish armies opposed to him. In Mesopotamia General Marshall had been equally successful, accepting the surrender of the last remnants of the Turkish Army of the Tigris at Mosul the day before the armistice was granted. The conditions ... were in strict accordance with President Wilson's Note to Berlin of October 23 - they "make a renewal of hostilities impossible".
